To Whom It May Concern,

Australia needs to look towards countries like Germany and embrace renewable energy instead of being locked in to a developing world mindset that we need to exploit our counties environment in order to appease the interests of ecocidal misers- Narrabri gasfield is a perfect example of this exploitation.

The arguments against renewables do not stand up. Competitive renewable markets drive down the price of energy and increase the job market, as proven in countries like Germany.

Australia needs to have high standards when it comes to clean energy. We have an ethical responsibility but also it is a challenge that we are capable of. We underestimate our strength at adaptation, instead setting ourselves low standards that makes us look like exploiters, incapable of robust resourcefulness whil relying on outdated modes which destroy our own habitats.

All the best,
Eddy
