I add the following:

IPCC has said that coal and other fossil fuel mining must cease immediately to save the planet from catastrophic warming. Though the challenge to the supreme court ruling on responsibility for future generations in relation to ministerial responsibility was overturned, the precedent is there that a court has recognised responsibility to future generations. The future generations will be back in court and will be arguing for substantial damages, against multiple protagonists.

I refer you to Paul Collins: The Depopulation Imperative-Australian Scholarly 2021, about putting Earth First. The new ethics. Even if these imperatives are not resonating with those who make these decisions, then there is the argument, which is still sustainable, that the destruction of heritage, both 1st nations and settler must resonate.

Laws can be exceeding destructive and not associated with justice. Since 2017 and The Uluru Statement from the Heart, the Federal Government has shown its incapacity to act towards 1st nations people with respect and to learn from them.

Stop mining coal in the Hunter Valley. It has already destroyed so much. I remember Glendell and the rest of the Hunter from 70 years, a green and pleasant land.
